A Cultural, Technical & Trade Bridge Between Japan & India

Dear Friends,

Konnichiwa. Ogenki Desu ka. We are very happy to inform all, that AOTS (The Association for Overseas Technical Scholarship) is celebrating its Golden Jubilee this year.

AOTS supports human resource development of private sector companies in overseas countries, thereby contributing to the future mutual development of Japan and other countries and enhancing mutual understanding and friendly relations between them and Japan.

During this AOTS 50th year celebration, there will be a Success Story Convention on 27th October 2009 and 10 "excellent" stories (best practices) duly selected from 198 success stories which were submitted by ex-participants in 26 countries, in the activity fields of "Technology Transfer", "Cultural Exchange" and "Social Contribution" will be presented. In the area of cultural activities under the theme "India-Japan Exchange Activities" our chairman M.R. Ranganathan will be presenting our success story.

We congratulate AOTS for its untiring Marathon innings of 50 years and wish them many more years of great service to the global community and also wish to thank every one of you who stood behind us in every effort of ours, so that we could be considered as a success.

In this year of AOTS Golden Jubilee, We moved away from Printed News Letter to Nihon Mon to eNews Letter and seek your continued support to this effort of ours.

Jobless rate hit six – year high of 5.4% in June

Kyodo News

Japan’s seasonally adjusted unemployment rate reached a six – year high of 5.4 percent in June, 2009 clouding prospects for a real economic recovery anytime soon, as the largest – ever number of people were axed, government data.

The rate rose from 5.2 percent in May at a time when industrial production and exports are in a recovery phase. The rate is at its highest level since April 2003, when it hit a record – high 5.5 percent.

The number of jobless people increased by the largest figure ever – 830,000, or 31.3 percent – from a year earlier to 3.48 million for the eighth straight monthly increase, the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications said in a preliminary report.

Of the told, 1.21 million had been laid off, up 620,000 from a year ago, the biggest increase since comparable data became available in January 2003, the ministry said. Separate data, released by the labor ministry, said the ratio of job offers to job seekers in June was at a seasonally adjusted 0.43, the lowest on record for the second straight month.

The latest ratio, down from 0.44 in the previous month, means there were 43 jobs available for every 100 job seekers.

Though economists and policymakers think the worst of the downturn is over, continuing layoffs and shrinking incomes could act as a drag on domestic demand and consumer spending – which makes up more than half of the economy – for some time to come. Many economists believe it is just a matter of time before the rate tops the current postwar record high of 5.5 percent.

“The rate will worsen at least through the end of this year,” Aida said. “It is projected to reach nearly 6 percent by that time.”

The Cabinet Office said last week Japan now has millions of hidden jobless people, who are not counted in official labor figures.

Its annual report said the number of excess workers at Japanese Companies during the first three months of 2009 is believed to have swelled to up to 6.07 million, and that the capability of these workers to remain employed under severe business conditions is reaching its limits.

Flexibility of Japanese Writing System

Japan’s rapid modernization and subsequent economic success was due not to the loyalty and endurance of the Japanese worker, neither to the symbiotic relationship between business and government, nor even to the legendary Japanese ability to copy and refine ideas and technologies from elsewhere. The foundation for Japan’s success, many Japanese feel, lay largely in the power and flexibility of its writing system.

Whereas the French fanatically attempt to preserve the purity of their language – to the extent of having a government committee police the introduction of foreign words (like le coke) – the Japanese took the opposite approach, first by basing their written language on Chinese pictographic characters, then by borrowing and adapting words as needed, mainly from English but also from Dutch, French, German, Italian, Russian, Spanish, and Portuguese.

“Japanese are an island people. They have no resources apart from their own diligence”. Said a Japanese friend. She meant that Japan, with no oil or mineral wealth and barely enough arable land to feed its population, could survive only by importing raw materials and exporting finished products. Doing this successfully depended solely on the skill and imagination of its people. Unlike the French, the Japanese regarded language as a raw material like any other, to be imported and fashioned into something use full.

The Japanese had no native writing system until, during the Asuka period (593 – 710). They began to borrow Chinese ideographic characters (called kanji). Each kanji represents as concrete word or concept but does not indicate how that word is pronounced, as an alphabetical writing system (such as English) does.

Moreover, kanji are ill – suited for representing grammatical markers and inflectional endings. To circumvent these problems, by the middle of the ninth century the Japanese had developed two phonetic alphabet systems the corved hiragana and the angular katakana.

Thus, the word for the Japanese language – nihongo – can be written using kanji, hiragana, or katakana.

Alternatively, it can be written in romaji (Roman letters), used for teaching elementary or conversational Japanese to foreigners and to enter Japanese text on a computer with a Standard English keyboard.
